

At the top of the village, way above, was the two-storey house where Peig Sayers had lived. It had been modern and strong in 1910, but the winds had punctured the roof and blown out the windows. In the seventies it was bought by an eccentric pilot from Alabama called Taylor Collins. He visited the Great Blasket on holiday and fell in love. Seized with an ambition to rebuild the island as a holiday ranch, he called on exiled plasterers and carpenters to do the work very cheaply. After all, why build a holiday house on an inaccessible island? One bottle of brandy, or so the rumour went. Collins was the only person west of Dingle who expected big things from the island. He had acquired Taylor Collings's share of the island from the Irish government – led at that time by Charles Haughey, the owner of Inis Icileain – which wanted to establish a national park. The issue was still before the Supreme Court as I crossed the island in the boat of the season, and the first signs of the island being brought back to life were visible.

infinite seascape, the village seemed compact and organic, its houses crowded close together in the one of the Great Blasket that faced the mainland and out to sea. The islanders were pragmatic people. In the year of their independence they returned in naomhóga to strip the island of doors, roof beams and slates, and any other material that might be useful in their new lives.
