

At the top of the village, way above, was the two-storey house where Peig Sayers had lived. It had been modern and strong in 1910, but the winds had punctured the roof and blown out the windows. In the seventies it was bought by an eccentric pilot from Alabama called Taylor Collins. He visited the Great Blasket on holiday and fell in love with it. Seized with an ambition to rebuild the village as a holiday ranch, he called on exiled islanders and bought their homes very cheaply. After all, who could expect big things from a derelict house on an inaccessible island? One might have a bottle of brandy, or so the rumour went. Collins thought that the people west of Dingle loved a good rumour. When his plans came to nothing, no one thought about who owned the island. In the mid-eighties, when an advertisement offered the island for sale for £100,000, the Irish government – led at that time by Charles Haughey, the owner of Inis Icileáin – which wanted to establish a national park. The issue was still before the Supreme Court as I crossed the island in the boat of the season, and the full signs of the island being brought back to life were visible.

infinite seascape, the village seemed compact and organic, its houses crowded close together in the one of the Great Blasket that faced the mainland and the other side of the island. The islanders were pragmatic people. In the year of their evacuation they returned in naomhóga to strip the homes of doors, roof beams and slates, and anything that might be useful in their new lives.
